

• Mirage Ring

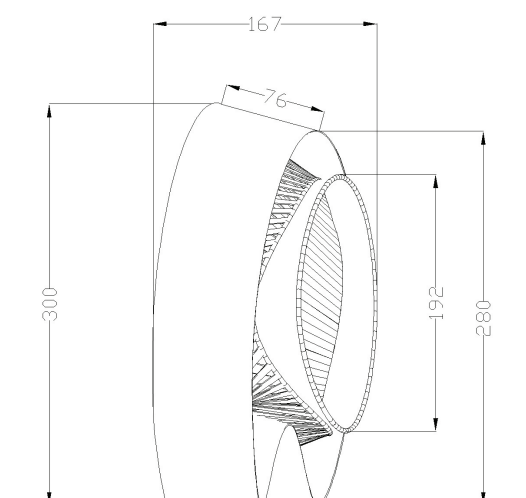

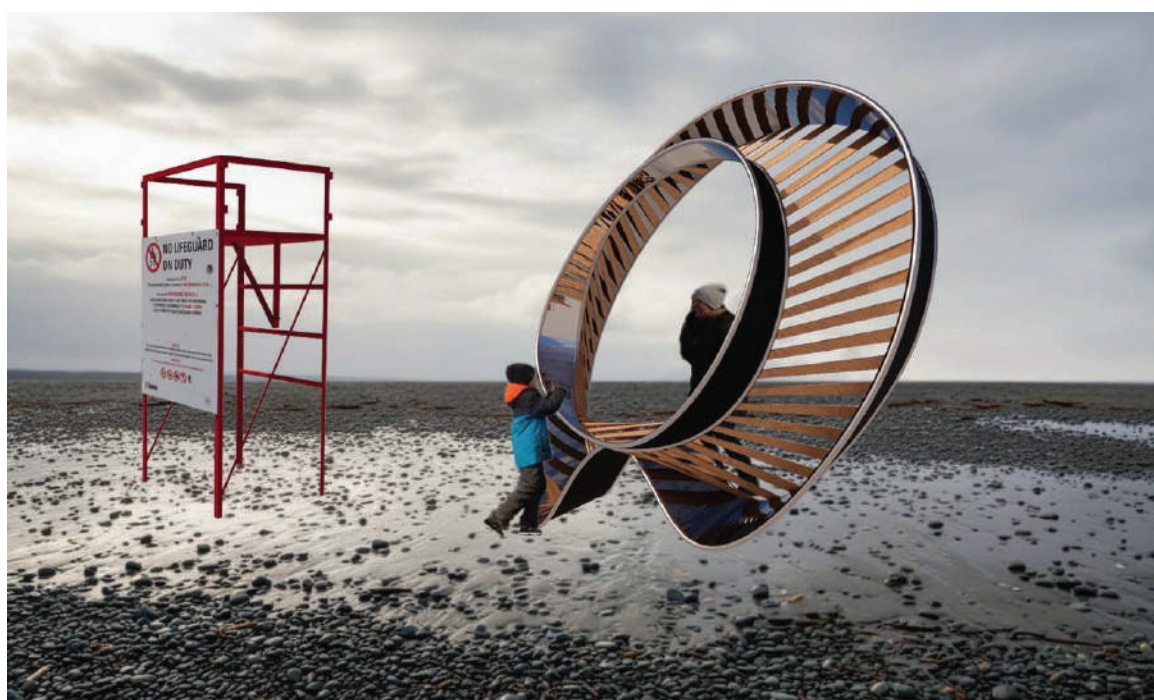

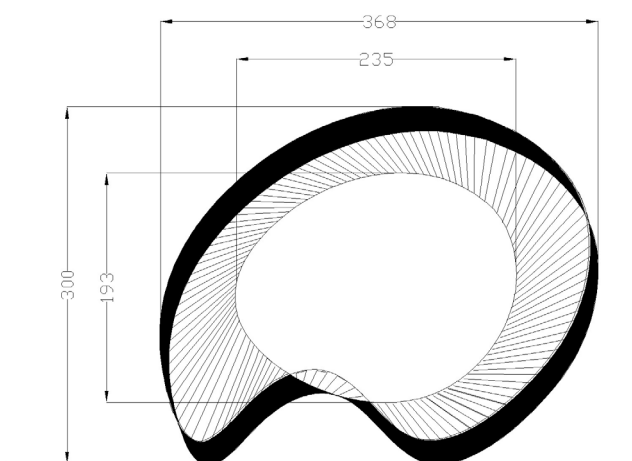

There is a heat on the horizon that we cannot reach. This heat is changing, cold on the outside and warm on the inside, an unreal movement that entangles the light of the sky and the sand and waves of the beach, and makes the structure suspended on the border between presence and absence. This curve, bending perception into a form with a ring similar to the movement of water, draws a line between the eye and the mind and the horizon line; a place where, with a moment of gazing at the waves, one experiences inner warmth and a sense of floating. Below this wave, the space of rotation in the sand and the pursuit of children upwards, a changing space there, blurs the reflection of the boundaries between the body and the environment, and what we see becomes a question of what we are truly searching for. . .
